John O'Leary

Editor, The Times Good University Guide

Further education colleges are already a major provider of higher education. Funding cutbacks and tuition fee rises will drive further change in the direction of FE. Government has signalled that more degrees should be taught in FE to provide alternatives, access and choice.

FE colleges and HEIs are used to working together. Collaborations and partnerships between higher education institutions in a region or a particular area are well established but could a new competitiveness disrupt such arrangements?

Do universities want to carry on collaborating if the FE sector becomes such a serious competitor? Will FE start to apply for degree awarding powers? Are colleges better equipped to provide part-time higher education for those in work?

This conference will address the way forward for FE and HE education; the various partnerships and collaborations possible; and the challenges of loss of funding.
